was saved from the Prussians and the Communists. At the beginning of the war, he says, when the first defeats showed that Paris was in danger of being besieged, the most valuable of the pictures in the Louvre were taken out of their frames and sent to Brest, but it was not easy to find a place for the statues, whose weight and fragility made it impossible to pack them for so long a journey Among these statues by for the most valuable was the Venus of Milo, "and the thought that this alorable work of art might
